What My Photo Means

Migration is not only reflected in the faces and stories of people, but also in the spaces that shape and transform the environment of a city. As a Latin American migrant, I can deeply relate to the feeling of finding a store where you can find the flavors you grew up with, the products you have always used, and a place where you can speak your language in a safe and welcoming environment. It is an experience that, even if only for a moment, makes you feel at home again. I interpret the reflection as a way of showing this duality: within it, you see the city to which you migrated, while inside the store there remains a piece of your home. The coexistence of these two worlds creates a sense of warmth, belonging, and comfort that every migrant, regardless of where they come from, should have the opportunity to experience.
